Dear Mike,

First, on behalf of the students at Wesley College I would like to thank you for your powerful, enlightening, and moving program on Monday, November 15, 2004. Although the crowd might not have been what I expected and hoped for, the message was certainly powerful and well received. The students who were required to attend, for class purposes, were thrilled to have gone to this lecture. Some students shared that your comments were down to earth, sensible, and realistic and offered in a manner that was not preachy or lecture style.

Other students told a professor who required them to go, that "she should have gone herself" and that "she would have really enjoyed it." A biology professor told me that she had her class attend and asked them to write a one-page reaction to the program. She then told me that not one person handed in a one-page reaction. Almost every student handed in a 3-4-page reaction paper!

The students I have interacted with since the program have expressed the impact your message left on them. You did not speak at them, nor did you lecture them. You simply shared a message with the students that often gets taken for granted. Additionally, you shared your personal story of your sister's rape and how it affected both her and you.

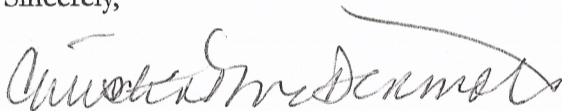

College campuses across the United States struggle with educating their students about healthy dating and sexual assault awareness. The style you use to present your point is the most powerful and effective I have encountered while serving as the Director of Student Activities. I would recommend you and your message to any College or University.
